The Temple of Extravagance

Modern times teach us: it is not always sensible for a company to blindly follow the greed of your shareholders. This statement was also valid 160 years ago.

At that time, the Leipzig living architect Eduard Pötzsch designed the Bayerischer Bahnhof as a lavish ensemble with an impressive portico. The shareholders were appalled, called the architect's plan a "Temple of extravagance" and demanded a cheaper building adapted to its single purpose as a train station.

However, Pötzsch had his way and was proven right. As other train stations from the beginnings of the railway business were torn down to make way for bigger versions, the Bayerischer Bahnhof effortlessly managed the enormous increase in traffic. Because of the prudence of its architect, the Bayerischer Bahnhof stood the test of time and is today one of the landmarks of our city.

Leipzig's Gate to the South

The Bayerischer Bahnhof, built from 1842 till 1844, once was Leipzig's gate to the south. It was here where huge shipments of cereal from Bavaria arrived and machinery from Saxony was loaded. Trains left for Munich, Vienna and even Italy. Emperor Wilhelm II., Grand Duke Michail of Russia, Karl Marx and Lenin - they all boarded at the Bayerischer Bahnhof.

At the end of the 19th century, the train station had more than one million travellers per year. Only after the opening of the new main train station in 1915 the importance of the Bayerischer Bahnhof decreased. Now, merely regional trains left the train station towards the south of Leipzig heading for chemistry companies and the opencast brown coal mines. These routes saved the Bayerischer Bahnhof from its demolition: despite various destruction plans from the city of Leipzig, the train station could not be rendered redundant. In 2001, when the train traffic was eventually discontinued, the ensemble with its portico was long since put under monumental protection and carefully restored to its former glory.

Moreover, with the opening of the City-Tunnel in December 2013 the Bayerischer Bahnhof is once more a train station.
